The global economy is becoming more complex. To grow in this environment, organizations require Chief Executive Officers with more than just a stellar resumes. Today's CEO requires the technical skills and strategic foresight to marry together the technological, regulatory, and economic opportunities. These skills must be combined with the ability to engage and inspire stakeholders at all levels across the business: from board members and a culturally diverse workforce, to consumers and the media.

In the future, many CEOs will be masters of technology and have a deep understanding of IT across the value chain. Technology will enable companies to enter new markets and leave existing ones with astounding dexterity. At the same time, the requirement for scale will diminish greatly -- as long as technology remains at the fore.

Meanwhile, investors and shareholders, now fully attuned to the need for transparency, will scrutinize the CEO of future and demand a high level of accountability. To cope, CEOs will need superb communication skills.

A visionary CEO reinvents the industry, empowers future and reboots the society.

These officers will also have to be highly resilient because they will be responsible – largely on their own – for steering the organization through relationships with employees, customers, suppliers and investors, as well as increasingly non-governmental organizations and social and environmental groups (Forbes - 06/2014)

With the perfect blend of today's technology and Odgers Berndtson's more than 50 years' executive talent search and development experience, this portal has been created. Organizations must battle against tightening regulation, growing competition, complex back office systems, and the uncertainty of new markets and new technologies. But on top of this, organizations are increasingly connected to each other, their customers, and the environment.
